As former Sr. Advisor to the Secretary of the U.S. Dept. of Interior, Robert Stanton served as key senior analyst and provided executive level advice and support on a wide range of environmental, educational, organizational and management challenges, and opportunities.

Stanton was confirmed as the 15th Director of the National Park Service in 1997, and served as the Director until the end of the Clinton Administration. He was the first Director to undergo confirmation hearings before the US Senate and the first African American to serve in the position.
